11. 5. Raster image editing Raster images are created using digital cameras or scanners and are represented as a grid of square pixels that are either black or white, depending on whether the pixel is either a dot on or off. Each pixel is much smaller than a photo, but an entire image may be represented by millions of pixels, with each pixel taking on one color. 12. 6. Pixel Each of the millions of pixels in a raster image occupies a specific place on the computer screen. The relationship between pixels and the resolution of an image is called dots per inch (dpi). Images created on a high-resolution camera like a DSLR or an iPhone generally have a resolution of around 72 dpi. It is possible to increase the resolution of an image up to around 300 dpi, or even more, but this can create ugly artifacts such as moiré and ugly aliasing. 13. 7. Pixel mapping Pixel mapping is the process of placing pixels on an existing image or creating a new image by enlarging a small area of an existing image. In some cases, pixel mapping is used to reduce the size of an image. Pixel mapping is done using Photoshop's Crop tool. Managing Data Now that you know the basics of cropping, sharpening, and other tools and techniques, it's time to talk about managing data. Even the most experienced photographers can benefit from the basics of managing data, so this chapter will provide the necessary steps needed to make your images both beautiful and keep them safe. The Save button in most programs (other than Microsoft Word) will move the changes made in the image directly to the program. However, you can save images as JPEG, TIFF, PSD, or PDF files to your computer's hard drive. Because this chapter is about saving images, rather than for practical purposes, save your work as JPEGs.

The research team at University College London has injected patients with their own adult stem cells, which are immature cells that can develop into any tissue in the body. The cells are thought to repair and regenerate damaged brain cells, helping patients make progress with their diseases.Q: How to clear a JPanel without refreshing the whole Frame? I have a couple of panels, I would like to clear a panel without refreshing the whole frame, I just need to clear or redraw the portion of the panel that has been interacted with, so that I can draw the next frame A: You should use the setBounds(...) method for the panels to draw only the area that the user interacts with. The easiest way to do that is to use the setOpaque(...) method. That way, you will only have to redraw the portion of the panel that has been interacted with, and not have to redraw the entire panel. Note that the panel's bounds are always smaller than the panel's visible area. That is, if you use setBounds(...) to set the panel's bounds to the size of the visible area, you will always have the panel grow for a little bit offscreen. That is usually okay though, as you can scroll to see all the content in the panel. In the second phase, the generator restarts and the new API operations are applied, allowing resources to be tagged without interruption.
